About the Lecture
In the aftermath of the visit in January this year by the President of the Sahrawi Arab Democratic Republic (SADR) to South Africa, and attempts of Morocco to be re-admitted to the African Union (AU), a discussion on the right to self-determination of the Sahrawi people is most timely.

The SADR (also known as the ‘Western Sahara’) is a disputed territory in the Maghreb region of North Africa. The area was under Spain occupation until 1975, when Spain relinquished administrative control of the territory to a joint administration by Morocco and Mauritania. A war erupted between those countries and the Sahrawi national liberation movement, the Polisario Front, which proclaimed the Sahrawi Arab Democratic Republic (SADR). Mauritania withdrew in 1979, and Morocco eventually secured de facto control of most of the territory, including all the major cities and natural resources. The AU’s predecessor, the Organisation of African Unity (OAU), expressed itself in favour of the right to self-determination of the Sahrawi people, and in 1982 admitted the SADR into the OAU. Morocco, up to that time a member of the OAU, in 1984 withdrew its membership.

The United Nations (UN) has been seeking a settlement in Western Sahara for many years. In 1991, the UN Security Council decided to establish the United Nations Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara (MINURSO). MINURSO was to oversee the implementation of a referendum in which the people of Western Sahara would choose between independence and integration with Morocco. To date, this referendum has not take place, mainly due to the obstructing role of Morocco.

The AU has largely left the matter to be resolved by the UN. The discussion aims to raise awareness and increase the understanding of the plight of the people of the Saharawi Arab republic.
